CUPID FROM RUSSIA

hope, for the sake of his American wife, that all will go well with him.

One of the most charming Americans bearing a Russian title is the Baroness Barthold von Hoyningen-Huene, who was Miss Emily Lathrop, daughter of George V. Lathrop, formerly United States minister to St. Petersburg. The Baron, a distinguished man, is captain of the Chevalier Guards of the Empress of Russia, and although her title is only that of Baron, he occupies a much higher position at court than does Prince Cantacuzene.

Our own Senator Dewey is distantly connected by marriage with the Russian court, for it was his word and niece, the beautiful Miss Edith Collins, who married Reichid Dey, an attaché of the Turkish embassy at Rome.

Despite his Turkish title, Reichid Dey is a Russian, and in his own country is the Count Czaykowski. The marriage took place in Paris, in January, 1897, and was a most brilliant affair, attended by the most prominent people of America and France who were in Paris at the time. Senator Dewey, who, besides being the guardian of the bride, had at one time been reported as engaged to her, was not present. The countess and her husband went to Russia, where they have remained ever since, and are from all accounts, very happily married.

Prince Nicholas Engelstreich, who married the daughter of Millionaire Partridge of Chicago, in 1898, had not the easiest time of it in securing his bride. The prince, though noble, was poor—in fact, what society calls penniless. He came to this country as a visitor to the world's fair, but remained to work as an insurance solicitor, becoming by necessary employment to the son of Prince Alexander of St. Petersburg, whose fortune consisted of much title and little else. He met Mrs. Evelyn Partridge Clayton in Chicago society. She had been married to Samuel L. Clayton, but the divorce court had severed the conjugal knot, and the young lady was free to be wooed. But, though the daughter seemed to favor the poor young prince's suit, Partridge pere frowned upon it—he did not relish having to support a son-in-law, however blue his blood might be.

The prince persevered, however, and the engagement was announced. But Mr. Partridge had it broken off. Three times did this happen, and when at last it was seen that the stern father would not relent the young people took it into their heads to marry anyway, and resolve permission afterward. Mr. Partridge finally agreed to witness the ceremony, but to countenance it in no other way. So it took place in Chicago.

The prince and princess also stood for Russia, where they are at present. The prince's fortunes have mended, and they are happy.

Other Russian-American unions have been frequent, among them being the cases of Miss Mathilde Vanderhoff, of this city, who married the Baron Ekamovitch of St. Petersburg and Miss Jeanne Byrd Carter, a great belle of Baltimore, who is now the Baroness Vladimir Kerskoff Xernovitch. The city of Cleveland, Ohio, too, has lent one of its fairest daughters to the Russian court in the person of Miss Elizabeth Hamilton Bearse, who is the wife of the Count Vernorski.

That all these weddings have resulted in happiness for both the American bride and the Russian husband speaks well for the young men of the czar's kingdom. And doubtless has gained for Russia many more American friends in her disagreement with Japan than she would otherwise have had under the circumstances.—N. Y. World.

A PEN PORTRAIT OF RUSSIA'S RULER.

All are agreed that as a man Nicholas II. has a charming character. A tender hearted and devoted son, he was never guilty of an act of the slightest selfishness. The beginning of the reign of a neighboring sovereign. He has no private views, and his domestic life is simple and pure. Without intellectual endowment of an exceptional kind, he is intelligent, well read and well traveled, and the only time he was ever in personal danger of his life was during his tour through Japan. His majesty has quickness of perception, sensibility and taste; but it is not so certain that his mind is of the kind which can master all the details and aspects of a complicated question. In discussing a political problem with a man for example, like Bismarck, he would have been as mere clay in the hands of the poster. To him is not the big, all-embracing brain of the scientific and historical imagination. He sees clearly enough, perhaps within his horizon, but there is nothing to show that this is of any great range.

Though trained of course as a soldier, he lacks the temperament and the taste of one; while so sensitive in his heart and so little calculated to resist even a description of the horrors of a battle field that on the occasion of his coronation, when so many of his people subjects were crushed to death on the Khodynskoi Plain at Moscow, he was afflicted with a severe attack of jaundice. Nicholas is as gentle as his mother, from whom, more than from his Russian father, he has inherited his temperament and physique; and certainly no one ever looked less what destiny has made him—the absolute ruler of a hundred and twenty millions of his fellow creatures than does Nicholas II.—Charles Lums in Boston Mail.

Dolls are often displayed in the cottage windows of Berlin. They are put up as a sign to entice to wayfarers that a marriageable daughter dwells in the house.

In a difficult essay written by an English schoolboy appeared the following paragraph: "He had and unto Moses. Come forth; but he came fifth and met the job. Moral, Gilt up only."
